ansa Burke acted a spinster course not so old as she pretended to be as a part of the dramatist's fable. She had met in a railroad station an entirely plausible lover, although their long session there—a washout and a hurricane combined to keep them prisoners all night—was not without its little outbreaks of temper. The worst was over the distribution of a sandwich and a hard boiled egg. Their rescue by a modern flapper who had travelled in a motor forty miles with this object in view, brought more serious disagreements. For the society of the young girl was not without its effect on the man who had found so much satisfaction in her older relative the night before.

He succumbs to the directness of the young woman's attack. The first engagements between the fiapper and the woman of the mature age of 28 result in complete victory for the youngster. Her attractions pall within a short time, but the minute of preference has determined the woman he had loved. He shall pay the penalty of that stolen glance at the fiapper, brief as it was.

So Miss Burke as the spinster tantalizes him cruelly about her age. She
